BIOGRAPHY

David Siegel is senior counsel in the Chicago Real Estate Group of Sidley Austin LLP who practiced as a partner for 18 years after joining the firm in 1994. David's practice includes a broad range of real estate acquisition, disposition, leasing, development and land use transactions of many types, including utility acquisition, disposition, development and financing transactions, corporate headquarters leases and other office leasing, leasing of distribution centers, warehouses and other industrial properties, acquisitions and leasing of senior living facilities, and real estate development matters including mixed-use developments, conference and learning centers, senior living facilities, museums, and utility substations.

David also represents the firm in connection with its own internal leasing matters, runs the training program for the U.S. Real Estate group, serves as a knowledge management partner for the group, and is a member of the firm's committee on the mentoring of associates. He has served as an adjunct professor at Loyola University Chicago School of Law for many years, where he lectures on the topic of real estate subdivisions and other land use matters, and has co-chaired and spoken at seminars addressing a wide variety of real estate law topics for organizations such as the Practising Law Institute, Law Seminars International and Lorman Education Services.
